The primary goal of health care reform is to reduce the rapidly rising cost of health care. To achieve this goal, many resources, including money, materials, time, and people, will be shifted from existing programs to new ones. We use case studies of Iowa's public health care system and analyze the criteria for decisions about the allocation of resources: quality, access, cost, and equity. We document and analyze the costs associated with maintaining current levels of care. The future cost to provide health care to the Iowa population is estimated by use of state-by-state mortality estimates for that population and national mortality rates for individuals in different age groups. Because the majority of services are delivered by government, and government shares are not allocated primarily on the basis of quality, the criteria for allocation of resources include access and equity. In addition, because resource constraints, particularly labor, are generally viewed as a constraint on improving quality, quality is considered a "bonus" in allocation decisions. Reducing net inpatient costs requires a shift in the economy, which, in turn, requires a redesign of the health care system.Organic Realty Elects President – Billy Foulkes Rendering of the new Ronkonkoma location.
